

E-mails reveal more than global-warming scam

A policy analyst says the leaked "ClimateGate" e-mails give a glimpse into the character of climate alarmists.

The e-mails were released by an alleged whistleblower within the University of East Anglia's Climate Research Unit (see earlier story). Climate change skeptics are referring to the incident as "ClimateGate" because they believe the information, which includes sought after computer codes used in climate models, provides evidence that data was manipulated and forged in order to exaggerate alleged "manmade global warming."

Taylor

James Taylor, a policy analyst with The Heartland Institute, says another disturbing find was an e-mail exchange celebrating the death of a noted Australian climate change skeptic John Daly.

"The response from one of the alarmists in these e-mails was one that this is something to be celebrated," regards Taylor. "And I found that to be completely repugnant."

He adds that anyone who celebrates someone else's death just because they had a scientific disagreement is "human filth."
